The pink and white buds of Malus Adirondack are evident on the tree in early spring, bursting into large white blossoms. The bloom cycle is annual, rather than the normal bi-annual. The bloom is only one of the reasons the National Arboretum introduced this plant. It is also of an upright nature, rare in Malus varieties. Beyond that it is one of the most disease resistant ornamental apples on the market. And it is loaded with reddish, persistent fruit which will be removed by the birds after frost softens the tissue. So, no fuss, no muss, a no-brainer. Pick up a dozen today.

Seriously, this is a great ornamental apple and should be used a lot, especially in today's smaller lots. Robinson Nursery has Malus 'Adirondack' available in branched trees.
